Re: Journal of Alzheimer's Disease and Parkinsonism, Pubmed indexing

Dear Reviewer:

I wish to write in support of Pubmed indexing for JADP. I am the co-Editor-in-Chief of JADP. This journal possesses an excellent review board of editors, publishes high quality scientific, peer-reviewed publications, and is constantly looking for ways to increase submission and readership. As you know, online, open access publishing is likely to become the future for scientific journals, including electronic versions of traditionally paper-based publications. In the same way as many other electronic journals are constructed, JADP promotes timely review of submissions and easy access by readers. In this way, there is a more flexible and rapid development of new scientific discoveries.

In the past two years I have published three neuropsychology-based research articles and one editorial, with that editorial and one of the journal articles in JADP. The quality of review and handling of my submissions at JADP has been equal to or better than that of the other journals (American Journal of Alzheimer's Disease and Other Dementias and Journal of Family Practice) where I have submitted. The quality of published articles in JADP has also been constantly improving in relevance, scientific merit, and readability. I strongly recommend JADP for Pubmed indexing.

Please feel free to contact me with any questions or follow-up. My email is mitch@cns-neuro.com.

Yours truly,
