Some studies have indicated that biologics exhibit greater long-term efficiency. According to a study conducted by University of Chicago, usage of biologics has resulted in an overall decrease in the number of surgeries by approximately 40.0%, emergency room visits by 60.0%, and hospitalizations by 50.0%.

Similarly, the National Institute carried out a study on effectiveness of infliximab in treatment for Health Research and it was reported to be a cost-effective solution in episodic treatment of active Crohn's Disease. Increasing need for cost containment in drug development as well as administration costs is likely to fuel growth opportunities for biologics. Advent of targeted treatment alternatives has led to development of more personalized biologics.
